Climate

South Africa is located south of the equator, between 22- and 34-Degrees South Latitude and thus falls within the scope of the subtropics. In comparison to the Northern Hemisphere, there are opposite seasons.

However, in comparison to areas in similar width positions the temperatures are lower in many regions. There is a generally well-tolerated climate for Europeans. The average duration of sunshine is amongst the highest in the world.

On the West Coast the cold Benguela current makes for temperate temperatures. In the central highlands (Johannesburg lies at about 1,650 meters above sea level) to achieve the high temperatures in summer rarely values of about 30 ° C.

In winter, temperatures in the central highlands, however also rise up to, or even below freezing. - In the coastal regions, but it will still be warm. Rain falls mainly in the South African summer months. - This does not apply to the Western Cape region, which is considered winter rainfall region.
